Description

This book draws together special contributions from eminent migration researchers to address the central question of how migration management has evolved from the national to the international and multilateral levels. Following an analysis of the progressive development of research-based migration management in Sweden, a comprehensive chapter reviews the multilateral response to migration in Europe over the last decades up to the present. Looking to the future, the “three big gaps” in migration are examined by three experts in demography, economics and political science, respectively. Finally, excerpts from recent speeches, a comprehensive bibliography and a short biography chronicle the substantial contributions of Jonas Widgren to the debate on migration management.
